The Bacteriological Laboratory conducted research and prepared vaccines against typhus, typhoid, cholera, Japanese encephalitis, etc. The buildings and the work done there were closely guarded, and only personal friends of employees were admitted as visitors. The laboratory had branches at Sanch' and Chongjin, and the Soviet professors who directed the laboratory used to make field trips of two or three months' duration to the branches. Patients sent from other organizations, such as the Medical Institute, were sometimes transferred to the laboratory, usually on orders rather than as volunteers. One such transferred person, from the Medical Institute, was YOUNG Sung-ha, a medical assistant, age about 29. Another employee of the laboratory was Professor HONG Sung-puk, a bacteriologist.

The Hygiene Laboratory took care of sanitary conditions in Pyongyang. Its functions included testing drinking water, disposing of sewage, etc. The Soviet advisor was NIKOLAEVICH.

The Epidemic Laboratory worked on disease prevention. NIKOLAEVICH was also its adviser.
